DISCOURSE I.

PSALM, 106. 24.

Yea, they despised the pleasant Land.

THIS Psalm is a short and concise history of the multiplied and unprovoked rebellions of the ungrateful Israelites ; and the writer of it enumerates their sins and provocations against the goodness and blessings of God unto them. Jehovah had conducted them safely through scenes the most trying, and through dangers the most formidable and imminent, and brought them to the confines of the promised land ; but the spies brought an ill report of it, though they owned it was a land which overflowed with milk and honey ; but that there were such difficulties to possess it, which they thought insuperable ; and hence the people despised it—in as much as when they were bid to go and possess it, they refused ; and did not chuse to be at any difficulty in subduing the inhabitants of it, or run any risk or hazard of their lives in taking it, though the Lord had promised to give it them and settle them in it. But they seemed rather inclined to make themselves a captain, and return to Egypt, which was interpreted a despising the pleasant land. See Numb. xiv. I.

This history conveys much instruction to us, and is well adapted to the designs of the day. And, before we proceed in illustrating and improving it ; the speaker must premise, that it is not his intention to irritate and inflame the feelings of any, in what he may deliver up on the present occasion. His motives are, the discharge of duty, and publicly to avow his warm, firm, and decided attachment, to the country which has adopted him as its citizen, and to the illustrious character who at present presides over it ; and to this duty he is urged by lively gratitude, and the solemn oath, which he has taken, of undeviating allegiance to it.

First.....Enquire, what are those things which are absolutely necessary to constitute a land pleasant. And we observe,

1. That a climate the most salubrious, and a soil the most fertile and luxuriant, which may spontaneously produce, not only all the necessities, but even the luxuries of life, may be rendered unhappy, and all these sweets blighted, and marred, through the intruding hand of some assuming and unfeeling tyrant. Such has been the state with the fertile lands of Portugal, Spain and Italy ; and such is the still existing state of more prolific Turkey. The God of nature has, in those countries, scattered his gifts most profusely ; but they are placed beyond the reach of the great mass of the people ; a favoured few, engross the sweets to themselves, and like the forbidden fruit of Paradise, no hand dare pluck them without incurring the displeasure of their lords and masters. Thus, the kind bounties of an indulgent providence, are prostituted, and his creatures, who have a natural right to enjoy them, are tantalized with having them in continual view, but are never filled with the sweetness of them. This must turn the most pleasant and fruitful land into a sterile and painful wilderness ; a land, which none of us, my hearers, would chuse as his home to dwell in, or as his place of sojourning.

2. To render a land pleasant the inhabitants must enjoy equal rights and privileges, otherwise it can be pleasant only to a favoured few, while the great majority are rendered objects of misery, through penury and distress ; and thus the comforts and blessings of civilized society, be abused and subverted, and even prostituted to the most ignoble and basest of purposes. We will demonstrate and illustrate this, not only from ancient, but modern governments. And here we observe, that society in every state is a blessing ; but government in its best state is but a necessary evil,—in its worst state, an intolerable one. For when we suffer, or are exposed to the same miseries by a government, which we might expect in a country without government, our calamity is heightened, by reflecting that we furnish the means by which we suffer. Government, like dress, is the badge of lost innocence. The palaces of kings, are built on the ruins of the bowers of Paradise. In ancient Greece, monarchy was the government which they first formed ; but this they soon found degenerate into tyranny. Hence the term tyrant, was justly applied to them.—And, indeed, the word originally signified no more than king, and was anciently the title of lawful princes. But monarchy gave way to a republican government, which, however, was diversified into almost as many various forms as there were different cities, according to the different genius and peculiar character of each people. But still there was a tincture, or leaven, of the ancient monarchical government, which frequently inflamed the ambition of private citizens, and made them desire to become masters of the country. In almost every stage of Greece, some private persons advanced themselves, by sabbal, treachery, and violence, and exercised a sovereign authority, with a despotic empire ; and in order to support their unjust usurpations, in the midst of distrusts and alarms, they thought themselves obliged to prevent imaginary or suppress real conspirators, by the most cruel proscriptions, and to sacrifice to their own security, all those whom rank, merit, wealth, zeal for liberty, or love of their country, rendered obnoxious to a suspicious and unsettled government, and which found itself hated by all, and was sensible it deserved to be so. What we have remarked of Greece, will with few shades of difference, apply to ancient Rome.

Let us now take a view of the modern governments of Europe, and examine how far they are calculated to add to the peace, comfort, and happiness of mankind ; and in the attempt our souls must overflow with gratitude to God, if sensible of the superior blessings and privileges we enjoy in this our favoured land. For,

3. A land to be pleasant, must have governors and magistrates, qualified and suited to the dignity and high stations they fill ; nor can they command the respect and affection of those they rule over, unless they are the men of their choice. For the truth of this, I appeal to your judgment. Should we feel happy, were a man to be forced upon us, as governor of this State, or as president of the United States ? And, granting the man, even qualified, in every point of view, would not our feelings revolt ? But should such an one act the part of a tyrant, by oppressing your persons, taking from you your property, and reducing you and your posterity, from complete ease and affluence to extreme want and beggary, the case would be still more afflicting. This representation is not ideal ; it exists, in all the aggravating circumstances here stated, and that, in the fast anchored isle of Great-Britain. The chief magistrate, or what they call king, is hereditary. How degrading this to an enlightened people ! It is a system of mental leveling. It indiscriminately admits every species of character to the same authority. Vice and virtue, ignorance and wisdom, in short, every quality, good or bad, is put on the same level. Kings succeed each other, not as rationals ; it signifies not what their mental or moral characters are. Such a government appears under all the various characters of childhood, decrepitude, and dotage ; a thing at nurse, in leading-strings, or in crutches. It reverses the wholesome order of nature ; it occasionally puts children over men, and maniacs to rule the wise. It requires some talents to be a common mechanic ; but to be a king requires only the animal figure of a man, a sort of breathing automaton. But I must observe, that I am not the personal enemy of kings. No man more heartily wishes, than myself, to see them all in the happy and honorable state of private individuals. But I am the avowed and open enemy of what is called monarchy ; and I am such, by principles which nothing can either alter or corrupt—that is, by my attachment to humanity—by the anxiety, which I feel within myself, for the ease and honor of the human race—by the disgust which I experienced, when I observed men, directed by children, and governed by brutes—by the horrors, which all the evils that monarchy has spread over the earth, excite within my breast—and by those sentiments, which make me shudder at the calamities, the exactions, the wars, and the massacres with which monarchy has crushed mankind. Would not you, my hearers, consider such a land, however salubrious the climate, however fertile the soil, however embellished with the progress of the arts and sciences, deprived of its birth-right and groaning under special marks of divine displeasure ? Let us rejoice, that we are in the full possession and free exercise of the privilege of selecting from ourselves, men, to be our rulers ; and while we give them a compensation for the services which they rendered the public, in their several stations, which is but just and reasonable ; for the labourer is worthy of his hire. Yet government in America is what it ought to be, a matter of honour and trust, and not made a trade of, as in England, for the purpose of lucre.

4. That which constitutes a land pleasant, is the state of society. To see every member of it in the enjoyment all the essential necessities of life ; we do not mean, that one and all should possess equal property, for this never was designed by the God of nature ; for there will be some who are comparatively poor, for the exercise of the benevolence of the rich. But that none should suffer through want or hunger, all who are in the enjoyment of health, and are industrious, should be able by moderate labour, to procure the comforts of life. We bless God that such a pleasant land is our inheritance. Here is a sufficiency of bread for all. Let the people here be but diligent, and a few years will place them in a state of independence. O how different is this, from what we see on the other side of the Atlantic ! Should the enquiry be what makes the difference, has not providence favored them with a fruitful land ? We reply, providence has not been to them sparing in its gifts : but through the cunning craft of men, these gifts are engrossed by a few choice spirits, who riot in luxury, at the expence of the labourer, the mechanic, and the husbandman. We will explain our meaning—The chief magistrate of England receives a million sterling, every year ; the other branches of his family, nearly the same sum, and a long list of placemen and pensioners, swell the burden to an enormous size. And all this is wrung from the hard earnings of the labouring poor. It is this wretched system which causes the land to mourn, which crowds the streets with beggars, and which drives men to the desperate act of invading the property of others ; for what will not hunger impel men to ! This picture is not overcharged ; some present have seen with their eyes, these things, and can bear witness to the facts. But let us turn our view from these sickning scenes, and contemplate our own condition on these happy shores, and we see an extent of territory, twelve times larger than England, and the expence of the several departments of the general representative government not amounting to what is allowed even to the king alone.

5. To render a land pleasant, it is essential that the means of grace should be enjoyed. It is these which add to the glory of any land, and render a people truly great. This it was that made the Israelites so much greater than other nations. Thus Moses describes them : “ What nation is there so great, that hath statutes and judgments so righteous, as all this Law which I set before you this day ? ” Without the Gospel, the most enlightened people, are no better than refined savages. The Gospel is a pearl of great price ; it is the glory and honor of a church, a people, or a person.. This only instructs us in the way of salvation. Trade and commerce, may gain and preserve an estate, bread may support the body, but this only can nourish and prop up the soul. When the Gospel is removed, the light is removed which is able to direct us, the pearl is removed which can only enrich us. In the want of this, is introduced a spiritual darkness, which terminates in eternal darkness. As the Gospel is compared to Heaven, and so called the kingdom of heaven ; so in the want of it, they are said to be cast down to hell. See Matth. 10. 23. So that what resemblance there is between heaven and the means of grace ; that there is between the want of them and hell. Both are a separation from God ; so that when the Gospel departs, all other blessings departs with it, and judgments succeed.—When the glory of God was gone up from the first cherub to the threshold of the house, see Ezek. 9. 3. the angels are commanded to execute the destructive sentence against the city. v. 4, 5. When the word of God is removed, the strength of a nation departs. The ordinances of God are the towers of Sion. The temple was not only a place of worship, but a bulwark too. The ark was often carried by the Israelites into the camp, because there their strength lay. And when David was chased away by his son Absalom, he takes the ark of the tabernacle, and his greatest strength against the defection of his son and subjects. This blessing, my hearers, we enjoy in a peculiar manner. The heavenly manna profusely descends around our tents, and every one may worship God in that form and manner which he thinks accords best with the volume of inspiration.

6. That which renders our land the glory of all lands, is to be free from all religious establishments, the bane of society, and curse of human nature. Let us enlarge a little on this subject. All religions are in their nature mild and benign, and united with principles of morality. They could not have made proselites at first by professing any thing which was vicious and persecuting, or immoral. How is it then, that they lose their native mildness, and become morose and intolerent ?—It proceeds from an alliance between Church and State. The inquisition in Spain and Portugal, does not proceed from the religion originally professed, but from this mule animal, as one calls it, engendered between Church and State. The burnings in Smithfield proceeded from the same heterogeneous production ; and it was the regeneration of this strange animal, afterwards, in the nation now called the bulwark of our religion, which revived rancour and irreligion. among the inhabitants there, and which drove the people called dissenters and quakers to this country. Persecution is not an original feature in any religion ; but it is always the strongly-marked feature of all law-religions established by law. Take away the law-establishment, and every religion reasumes its original benignity. Here in America, a catholic priest is a good citizen, a good character, and a good neighbour ; the same may be said of ministers of other denominations, and this proceeds, independent of men, from there being no law-establishment in America.

The Constitution of the United States has abolished or renounced toleration, and intoleration also ; and has established universal right of conscience. Toleration is not the opposite of intoleration, but is the counterfeit of it ; both are despotisms. The one assumes to itself the right of withholding the liberty of conscience, and the other of granting it. The one is the pope armed with fire and faggot, and the other is the pope selling or granting indulgences. The former is church and state ; the latter is church and traffic. This is the perverted state of things in that kingdom called the world's last hope. And though the gospel is there preached, yet it is the misfortune of many who love it, to have a minister imposed upon them, who is an enemy to it ; and which minister they must support, with the tenth of their tythes ; even though dissenters from the established church ; and what adds to the turpitude of all this, no man can hold any place of trust or employ under the government, who is not an episcopalian, without first receiving the sacrament of the Lord's Supper, on his bended knees, to qualify him for office. Must it not be duplicity, nay, the very essence of hypocrisy, in any man, to call such a kingdom, "the bulwark of our religion."

USE 1. Let us to-day, deplore, and lament over our manifold sins, which have tempted God to let loose upon us one of his sore judgments. The sword is drawn, and more than probable, while I am addressing you, it is bathed in the blood of some of our fellow-citizens.— It is true, that at present, through mercy, it is placed at a distance from us ; but some on our frontiers, and on the sea, have already fallen sacrifices, and we know not how soon it may be permitted to approximate our habitations. The fate of war is always precarious and uncertain. Let not him who putteth on his armour, boast like him who putteth it off. Remember it is God alone who giveth us the victory. Let our eyes then be directed to him, and all our expectations from him. This by no means supercedes the necessity of our warmest exertions. No, it is the sword of the Lord and Gideon. Let us then assist the brave, generous defenders of our country, who are vindicating our rights, and redressing our wrongs. Let us, I say, assist them by prayer and fervent cries, for prayer has ever proved a powerful weapon. If it overcomes God, it certainly will overcome men. Thus, while the hand of Moses was upheld by the prayer of Aaron and Hurr, he prevailed in the battle against Amalek. And it is promised, that one such, shall chase a thousand, and two, put ten thousand to flight. Thus Jehosaphat, after he had proclaimed a fast, when a great multitude came against him, addresses God in prayer : O, our God, wilt thou not judge them, for we have no might against this great company, which cometh against us, neither know we what to do, but our eyes are upon thee. And when they began to sing, and to praise, the Lord routed their enemies, with a great slaughter.

2. Let us encourage ourselves in the Lord, from the nature of the enemy we are now engaged with. In our infancy, we humbled their pride, and chained to the chariot wheels of our triumph, two of their most celebrated generals; one of which boasted on the floor of Parliament, that with 3000 men, he would march in triumph, from one end of our continent to the other. Part of his assertion appeared to be prophetic, for he passed through a section of our continent, not as a conqueror, but a crest-fallen prisoner. If we achieved such exploits in our infant state, what shall we not, through providence, be able to do now in our manhood? Add to this the multiplied crimes of the government we are opposed to; a government, founded and cemented in blood, and its tottering state, still upheld by blood; a government with which, it is evident, the Lord has a controversy. How different the state of this, our happy land. Never had a country so many openings to happiness as this; her setting out into life, like the rising of a fair morning, was unclouded and promising; her cause was good; her principles just and liberal; her conduct regulated by the nicest steps, and every thing about her wore the mark of honour. Here I will give you the language of Mr. Rush, the orator of the day, at the seat of our government, the 4th of July last. When, let us ask with exultation, when have ambassadors from other countries been sent to our shores, to complain of injuries done by the American States? What nation have the American States plundered? What nation have the American States outraged? Upon what rights have the American States trampled? In the pride of justice and true honour, we say, none. But we have sent forth from ourselves the messengers of peace and conciliation, again and again, across seas, and to distant countries—To ask, earnestly to sue, for a cessation of the injuries done to us. They have gone to protest, under the sensibility of real suffering, against that course which made the persons and the property of our countrymen, the subjects of indiscriminate and rapacious spoliations. These have been the ends they were sent to obtain. Ends too fair for protracted refusal, too intelligible to have been entangled in evasive subtilties, too legitimate to have been neglected in hostile silence. When their ministers have been sent to us, what has been the aim of their missions? To urge redress for wrongs done to them, shall we ask again? No, the melancholy reverse. For in too many instances, they have come to excuse, to palliate, or even to endeavour, in some shape, to rivet, those inflicted by their sovereigns upon us.

We, my hearers, have nothing to fear eventually, in our contest with a government so depraved and corrupt, as that of the British.—

Her fictitious wealth is depreciating ; her most wise and virtuous statesmen cannot be prevailed upon to join, and unite in her councils ; her prince regent has, by his intemperance and debaucheries, reduced himself to the state of an idiot : and the multitudes of her poor, rendered desperate by hunger, are already threatening to overwhelm it with their vengeance. In short, every sign of the times, indicates her speedy dissolution. Certainly the righteous God will not suffer her wicked and horrid ravages to go unavenged, even here upon earth. Let us wait awhile, and we may live to see the time, wherein it shall not be said by the voice of faith, but by the voice of sense itself, Babylon, the great, is fallen, is fallen !

DISCOURSE II.

PSALM 106. 24.

Yea, they despised the pleasant Land.

THE speaker, in the forenoon, called your attention, to the distinguishing goodness of God, which has exempted us as a people, from the burdens, oppressions, and calamities, under which the nations of Europe groan, and which wring from the inhabitants, the most piercing cries. Our lines have fallen in pleasant places ; yea, we have a goodly heritage : but some among us, like Jeshurun of old, have waxed fat and are kicking against the rock of salvation. This leads us,

Second—TO EXHIBIT THE CHARACTERS WHO DESPISE THE PLEASANT LAND.

We charge no party, solely, as implicated in this crime ; but shall attempt to demonstrate that there are such men among us. And we will, as we proceed in our description, adhere to the criterion laid down by our Saviour—you shall know them by their fruit.

1. Men may be said to despise it, when they make light of their privileges, either in a natural, moral, or political view.

First, in a natural view. The mercies, which we call natural, are those which are necessary for our nourishment and support ; and that we, as a people, abound in these, is evident to all. We live in a land overflowing with a rich variety of God's providential goodness. Here is no leanness of teeth ; our streets are not crowded with our fellow-creatures, soliciting the aid of our benevolence—nor our ears assailed with the melancholy tales of indigence and distress. The parent, with pallid cheeks, hollow eyes, and trembling limbs, arrest not our steps with importunate cries for relief to their helpless infants, pining in want, and the lamp of life ready to expire, because destitute of means to nourish it. We are placed far from these sickening scenes. But, alas ! do we not make light of these mercies ? We enjoy the mercies, and forget the donor. We take what he gives ; but pay not the tribute he deserves. The Israelites forgot God their Saviour, which had done great things in Egypt. We send God's mercies, where we would have him send our sins, into a land of forgetfulness ; and write his benefits, where he himself will write the names of the wicked, in the dust, which every wind effaces. We forget his goodness in the sun, while it warms us—in the showers, while they enrich us—and in the corn, while it nourishes us. It is an injustice to forget the benefits we receive from man, but a crime, of a higher nature, to forget those dispensed to us by the hand of God, who gives us those things which all the world cannot furnish us without him. It is, in God's judgment, a brutishness beyond that of a stupid ox, or a duller ass. The ox knoweth his owner, and the ass his master's crib, but Israel doth not know, my people do not consider. How horrible, that God should lose more by his bounty, than he would by his parsimony. If we had blessings more sparingly, we should remember him more gratefully. If he had sent us a bit of bread in distress, by a miracle, as he did to Elijah, by the ravens, we should retain it in our memories. But the sense of daily favours, soonest wear out of our minds, which are as great miracles, as any in their own nature, and the products of the same power.

Secondly, We despise our moral and spiritual privileges, when we reject the truths of revealed religion. This is one of the crying sins of our land. Errors which were almost obsolete, are reviving, and the professors of those pernicious doctrines, are daily multiplying and increasing, by which the glories of Christ are laid prostrate in the dust ; and the object of the christian's dearest hope is degraded, and brought down to a level with a creature, so that we had need to tremble at the prospects before us ; for these sentiments, like the explosion of a subterraneous fire, may ere long burst forth and spread ruin, slaughter, and death, all around, should they become the creed of an established religion. Let no one say, we live in an age too enlightened, for religious persecution to gain head. But stop ; let us for a moment examine the force of this reasoning ; and one remark shall suffice. Could any of you, venerable patriots, who joyfully took the spoiling of your goods, and waded your way through blood to gain the pinnacle of liberty, could you suppose, at the close of your national struggle, that in the year 1812, your fellow-citizens should become objects of persecution, for an attachment to those very sentiments, for which so many of our fathers bled and died? And who are the characters who foment and the very ringleaders of this intolerant spirit? Are they not those who profess the aforesaid sentiments?

Men despise the pleasant land, who make light of the Gospel, and will not attend to the preaching of it; or if they give it a hearing, refuse to comply with its just and reasonable requisitions. It is not enough, to be within the visible ark; so was a cursed Ham. Let us not receive the grace of God in vain; but adorn the gospel, by a gospel spirit, and a gospel practice, and walk as children of light. Let us not trample it under our feet, but put our souls under the efficacy of it, and get from it the foretastes of a heavenly and everlasting light. Let us not loiter while the sun shines, lest we be benighted, and bewildered, and misled, and finally miscarry.

Those may, with the strictest propriety, be ranked among the despisers, who dragoon religion into their service, and make it the trumpet of sedition and rebellion. The gospel, is the gospel of peace. It was introduced by angels with Glory to God in the highest, and on earth good will to man. Christ, the author of it, is called the Prince of Peace; and it inculcates peace on all its followers. How malignant, then, must that soul be, which would convert it into an engine to irritate, goad, and inflame the passions of men, to strife, blood, and slaughter? When the sacred desk, is converted into a vehicle of scandal, and calumny, and charges predicted on misrepresentation and the most glaring falsehood; this is a prostitution, not only of place, but office, and sinking the ministerial character into that of a public informer. It is a melancholy consideration, that such occurrences should have taken place, as to force from the speaker such observations; but when the poison is openly and widely diffused, it is the duty of every good man to administer an antidote, to counteract the effects of it. Such conduct strikes at the root, and is subversive of a free government, and has a tendency to introduce anarchy and confusion. It likewise flies in the face of divine authority, and subserves the cause of infidelity; for no truth is more explicitly revealed, than due subordination to government. We will quote a few to corroborate our assertion. Exod. 22. 28. Thou shalt not revile the Gods, nor curse the rulers of thy people. And Rom. 13. 1, 2. Let every soul be subject unto the higher powers. For there is no power but of God; the powers that be, are ordained of God. ————— Whoever resisteth the power, resisteth the ordinance of God; and they that resist shall receive to themselves damnation. Jude calls these disorganizers, v. 8. Filthy dreamers, who defile the flesh, despise dominion, and speak evil of dignities. Can there be a greater prop to infidelity? Did Thomas

Paine, with all his frantic ravings against the christian religion, give it so fatal a stab as these pretended advocates of it, who in direct opposition to its express commands, defame and pour a torrent of abuse upon our worthy President ; a man who, when first inducted into the Presidency, was represented, by these his now defamers, as a converted man, and an experimental christian. But all these puny attempts to sink, will but elevate him the higher, in the esteem of every genuine American ; and with dignified composure, and silent contempt, he hears all these unfounded accusations, as the ebullitions of ignorance or of a maniac ; and he who has so long withstood the roaring of lions, has nothing to fear from the braying of an ass.

3. Men despise our political privileges, when they use every stratagem to render our government contemptible, and to alienate the affections of their fellow-citizens from it. This is to imitate satan, who would rather reign in hell, than be subordinate in heaven. Never did human wisdom devise so fair a fabrick as our Federal Government.— Each State united to the other, like the several members of the human body, co-operating for the good of the whole ; so that one cannot say, I have no need of you. All are bound by solemn compact, to adhere to each other ; for the good of the whole, is the good of each. — How malicious ! how cruel ! how savage ! to attempt to mutilate so, fair a fabric, and to loose the bond of union, and destroy a system which, with its increasing years, hath produced increasing prosperity. We grant that our apparent prosperity has partially been interrupted ; but this arose not from any defect in our government, nor in those at the head of it ; but from the existing state of the European world, which, for a few years past, has been in an uncommon fermentation.— Nor could Solomon, had he presided over us, have guarded us against the collisions of the belligerent powers. French ambition, and British cupidity, have committed spoliations on our commerce to a vast amount. But must not every impartial person admit, that, to promote a spirit of discord and disunion among ourselves, is not the way to redress, but the sure method to incite them to greater aggressions. Let us frown, indignant, at every attempt to dissolve our federal constitution, however sacred may be their functions ; let us regard them as missionaries of him who is the father of lies, and a murderer from the beginning.

When men counteract the means which the wisdom of our Executive devise to assert our rights, redress our wrongs, and maintain our national dignity and honor—or even when they be cold and lukewarm in promoting them, they come within the charge of our text. Such characters may use plausible pleas, to extenuate their conduct—such as the temper of the public mind, the persecutions they shall be exposed to, and the losses they shall sustain ; but if these pleas are valid now, they were valid during our revolutionary war ; and had the patriots of that day, displayed the same spirit, we should be groaning now in Egyptian bondage. Let such tremble ; let them arise from their torpor, lest they subject themselves to the anathema pronounced against some in days of old. See Judges 5. 23. Curse ye Meroz, said the angel of the Lord ; curse ye bitterly the inhabitants thereof, because they came not to the help of the Lord, to the help of the Lord against the mighty.

When men turn liberty into licentiousness, and take shelter under the lenity of our law, to degrade and abuse the majesty of the law ; this has a tendency to destroy the liberty we enjoy, and lay prostrate in ruin, the fair edifice, which has for thirty years withstood all the rude shocks to which it has been exposed ; either by exciting our legislators to lay some restrictions on the press, which at present teems with so many inflammatory, virulent, and infamous publications, or else reducing us to a state of anarchy. Let me, on this occasion, advise you my hearers, to adhere, inflexibly adhere, to the principles of Republicanism. But at the same time, bear and forbear, with the insults which your principles may expose you to. Remember, our constitution is founded on the right of private judgment, and that principles cannot be destroyed by the force of arms. No ; let reason and argument be the only weapons which you will use ; and if violence be heard in our land, wasting and destruction within our borders, let them not originate from those who call themselves republicans, and friends of our government ; but from those who assume to themselves, the exclusive privilege of being the friends of good order.

Use 1. Let us, to-day, lament over the ruin of lapsed nature, and over the jarring, discordant, and destructive effects, which sin has introduced, in all our national calamities, under all the pressure of the times, and in the midst of personal sufferings. Let us hear the answer of God to all our murmurings : Thy way, and thy doings, have procured these things unto thee : This is thy wickedness, because it is bitter, because it reacheth unto thy heart. Let us humble ourselves under the mighty hand of God, and by faith in the Redeemer, and genuine repentance, disarm a frowning God of that vengeance which we have demerited at his hands.

2. Let us, like so many Moseses, stand in the gap, and plead with God, that he would spare us, a guilty people, and still indulge us with a continuance of those privileges for which our fathers fought, bled, and died. O, let us not barter them away for present enjoyments, but patiently submit to, and bear a few privations whilst the present contest continues ; and though much of our property may be exhausted in the struggle, yet it is better to leave our families the possession of our present privileges, without the possession of a cent, than to leave them millions of dollars, with the entailment of slavery.

3. Let those, who openly express their disaffection to our government, pause, and reflect on the criminality of their conduct ; for God himself bears witness against those sins which disturb society. In these cases, he is pleased to interest himself in a most signal manner, to cool those, who make it their business to overturn the order he hath established for the good of the earth. He doth not so often in this world punish those faults committed immediately against his own honour, as those which put a State into a hurry and confusion. It is observed, that the most turbulent, seditious persons in a state, come to most violent ends : As Corah, Adonijah, Zimri : Ahitophel draws Absalom's sword against David and Israel, and the next he twists a halter for himself. Absalom heads a party against his father, and God, by a goodness to Israel, hangs him up, and prevents not its safety, by David's indulgence, and a future rebellion, had life been spared by the fondness of his father. His Providence is more evident in discovering disturbers, and the causes which move them, and in digging the contrivers out of their caverns, and lurking-holes. He doth more severely in this world, correct those actions, which unlink the mutual assistance between man and man, and the charitable and kind correspondence he would have kept up.

4. How lost to gratitude, and love of country, must be such of our deluded citizens, who can rejoice in the disasters of those, who are engaged in warfare, against our proud, insulting foe ; and are ready to weep at any success which attends our arms. Even the brute beast is attached to the spot which affords it pasture ; but they, more brutish, would tear to pieces the foliage of the tree which screens them from the storm, and, unlike the beast, maliciously invite others to join them in blasting our fairest prospects, and laying all in wide ruin and destruction ! Is not this too evidently the wish of those among us, who make use of every artifice, and twist and turn all the patriotic measures of our Executive, as being under the control of French influence ? which their own conscience cannot subscribe to, neither do they themselves believe so. But the evil object they have in view, they studiously conceal ; and this outcry against French influence, is raised as a mist to blind the eyes of the public, and to subserve the design of pulling down our present rulers, and to raise themselves on their ruin. Should they succeed in their nefarious plan, what would be the destructive consequence ? Why, we soon should see these very same people, who are so clamorous against foreign influence, forming an alliance with Great-Britain, offensive and defensive, which would involve us in the same ruin with herself. Let us, for the truth of this, appeal to stubborn facts. Who is it that justify, and, if they cannot justify, palliate all the insults which we have for ten years past received from that government ? If they outrage all laws, moral and divine, by impressing thousands of our gallant seamen ; and if, either by bribes, or cruel whippings and floggings, they are forced to enter the service, their advocates extenuate their conduct, by observing, that it is impossible for them to discriminate between our people and their own, as our features and language are so similar. With such reasons and arguments, they justify the cruel wrongs, inflicted on our unhappy countrymen, who are forced to join and assist the common enemy, in their murderous work, and who are perhaps this moment, embruving their hands in the blood of their nearest friends and dearest relative. These predilections for a government, which is sowing among us the seed of discord, sedition, and treason, and which wishes to tear from us our dearest rights, demonstrates where the bias of their minds tends to. Nor can a word be uttered in their hearing against the British, but what they resent more than they would blasphemy; this speaks volumes, and evidently points to us the object which they have in view. But let them tremble for their conduct. The great mass of our citizens, have too long tasted the sweets of liberty, to exchange it for the gew-gaws of monarchy. It is enough for us to will to be free, and, maugre all the attempts of anarchists and monarchists, we are free. And let them not suppose, that their misdeeds shall go unpunished. The day of reckoning is fast approaching, when the strong arm of law and justice, will overtake them, and make them sensible that even in a republican government, there is energy enough to crush the guilty.

5. Let not the exertions of the religious inhabitants of England, influence your attachment to the British government, as if the large donations contributed for the support of Missionaries, the distribution of Bibles, and other religious purposes, were the acts of government.—These are the generous efforts of its subjects, of individuals, groaning under the pressure of taxes. And how much more would these individuals contribute toward these benevolent purposes, were the demands of government not so numerous! So far is it from true, that the British government is friendly, that it is opposed to the spread of the gospel among the millions in Asia. For, within eight years past, the government of England rejected the application of the Missionary Society to send missionaries to India, to preach the gospel; and which subjected that society to the expence of sending them to New-York, from whence they embarked to the place of their destination. To conclude,

Men, Brethren, and Fathers,

Let us, to-day, take a fresh survey of our National, our State, and our personal Blessings, and let us entertain them with a godly jealousy. Let no man, under a pretext of liberty, cajole us out of our privileges. With all our calamities, we are comparatively a happy people. We can boast of what no other people can. The sovereignty is in our own hands. We are not bound, as in France and England, to crouch like beasts of burden to those who goad, and add to the weight of their chains. Our rulers are our servants, and not our masters. It is by our free suffrages, they have been elevated to their exalted stations; and if they swerve from the principles of liberty, we can destroy their official dignity, and reduce them to the ranks of private citizens, without having recourse to acts of violence. The miseries attending the French revolution, must be yet fresh in your memories ; and we hope, and pray, that no aspiring demagogues may be permitted to rise up among us, whereby the proscriptions, assassinations, and murders, of a ferocious Marat, and an ensanguined Robespierre, may pollute and stain our hallowed land of liberty and equality.

And you, my young hearers, read, frequently read, the history of your country. Emulate the deeds of your sires, whose patriotic arms, put to flight the ruffian hords, which Britain vomited on our shores. O, prove yourselves to be the descendants of those, whose names will shine with lustre on the historic page ; and should you, like them, be called to avenge your country's wrongs, prove, that you not only inherit their names, but likewise their courage ; and that you will not detract from their glory, but maintain with your blood, undiminished, the fair inheritance which they have bequeathed you. And, O, that a double portion of their spirit may rest on you. AMEN, & AMEN.
